Market Commentary

It was a mixed month for asset classes in February. Interest rate cut expectations had gone too far at the beginning of the year and market participants are now expecting this to be later in 2024 which has resulted in bond yields increasing during the month. When this happens bond prices fall, and most major bond markets delivered negative returns during the month. On the flip side, global economic growth indicators improved, coupled with strong earnings data announcements which helped propel some global stock markets to new all-time highs.

During the month it was announced that the UK is technically in recession following two negative quarters in the second half of 2023. Importantly though, this recession is very mild and one of the weakest on record. There are also signs that the UK may have already exited recession following comments from the Bank of England Governor Andrew Bailey on the back of stronger, more recent economic data. As well as this it was interesting to note the Governor mentioning that inflation doesn't need to fall back to the central bank

2% target before interest rate cuts come.

The Chinese equity market, the Hang Seng, led the way against major global equity markets in February, bouncing from the lows in recent years. However, the standout markets during the month were in Japan and the US. The Nikkei 225 closed the month at an all-time high, which was staggeringly last set on 29th December 1989! Strong earnings and share price performance from Nvidia, the Artificial Intelligence (AI) darling, helped propel US markets to fresh highs. The latest leg of its meteoric rise has made Nvidia the third most valuable company in the S&P 500, going beyond Alphabet and Amazon. Nvidia enjoyed the biggest one-day market value gain of all time—an astonishing $276.75 billion. This was because of growing sales of their AI chips, margins improving and a strong order book looking forward.

Looking forward every major economic data point will be in focus with central banks being on standby mode.
