Market Commentary

It's certainly been an eventful start to the year and that continued at a pace in February. We saw interest rates cut, inflation picking up, tariffs and seesawing activity on the end of the conflict in Ukraine.

There seems to be a global will for the war in Ukraine to be brought to a halt with numerous meetings held during the month. Whilst this would be a clear positive for the people of Ukraine, it would certainly be well received in Europe. The initial market response when Russia invaded Ukraine was a spike in commodity prices, most notably in Energy markets. Therefore, an end to the conflict could also see a slight reverse in Energy prices. This would be welcome by governments because it would provide some relief on inflation, which is proving to be stickier. Equally, a lower energy price would be welcome to European corporates that would see input costs fall and higher profitability.

Closer to home, the Bank of England decided to cut interest rates to 4.5%, the lowest base rate since June 2023. This was despite inflation figures released in the month showing that the Consumer Price Index (CPI) has increased to 3%, above the 2% central bank target. The commentary around inflation from the central bank is also that inflation will continue to pick up over the coming months due to price increases coming through in April, whether that be Water, Energy, National Living Wage, and price increases following on from the budget.

The Ukraine developments, coupled with relatively low valuations seems to be propelling UK and European equities in 2025. February was another strong month with European markets again stronger in February. US stocks were weaker during the month, a reflection of slightly weaker economic growth data and higher valuations. The strongest market was China, driven by a boost in sentiment towards the Technology sector.

Weaker economic data out the US had an impact on bond markets, with the expectation that the Federal Reserve will cut interest rates quicker in 2025 feeding through to lower bond yields and therefore higher prices due to their inverse relationship.

The Ukraine developments, coupled with relatively low valuations seems to be propelling UK and European equities in 2025. February was another strong month with European markets again stronger in February. US stocks were weaker during the month, a reflection of slightly weaker economic growth data and higher valuations. The strongest market was China, driven by a boost in sentiment towards the Technology sector.
